So, in this circumstance, where we have the photons, then we have to have an ensemble of photons. So, that's what we're trying to say in this correspondence principle is if you have the photons, then you have to have an ensemble of photons in order to be able to observe this. So, I will go to the end. In the sixties, he was looking at the observation of the hydrogen. So, he was doing that at a much higher energy than these experiments that we are discussing now, but this is the history of what we are talking about and then, how he came to that correspondence principle, the final proof of the correspondence principle. You have seen now the source. The source is the principle. The reader can get it in one sentence. It's a clever way to start a photon explanation of what is going on inside an atom. I think I have time for one last question in this session and

Platelet thromboxane A2 formation is elevated in migraine attacks. Migraine attacks are thought to arise as a consequence of failure of blood-brain barrier (BBB) function. The role of the platelets in the pathogenesis of migraine has been extensively studied. In the animal model of migraine, serotonin induced headache, migraine is found to be associated with a transient reduction in blood-brain barrier (BBB) function. This suggests the possibility that platelet activation and plasma coagulation play a role in inducing migraine attacks in the setting of compromised BBB function. It has been shown in humans that plasma coagulation factors in addition to platelets also play an important role in the initiation of migraine. Elevated levels of the coagulation factors, fibrinogen and thrombin-antithrombin (TAT), are observed in migraine patients with aura. These levels are associated with a migraine attack that has the characteristics of migraine with aura. The ability of activated platelets to produce procoagulant activity is attributed to their release of thromboxane A2. Thus, platelet activation is associated with the release of 2 procoagulant products, thromboxane A2 and heparin, which promote vessel constriction and leukocyte adhesion. Thus, a given amount of platelet activation might generate either vasoconstriction or vasodilatation, depending on the levels of the coagulation factors. To determine the relative importance of platelet activation in eliciting vasoconstriction ba244e880a
