Anti-IgM antibody induced proliferation of peripheral blood mononuclear cells from individuals allergic to perennial allergens is significantly reduced in the presence of high concentrations of cyclosporin A. However, when IL-2 receptor bearing cells are present, a number of Ig-containing B cells proliferate to a greater extent than when IL-2 receptor bearing cells are absent. These data suggest that cyclosporin A has a direct effect on the cytokine dependent proliferative response to IL-2.Blindness in primates: new insights from a visual ecology perspective. Habituation of all animals depends on an ability to respond selectively and appropriately to their environment. This selective responsiveness is based on the relationship between animals and their environment, which is the basis of what some call the ecological niche. I propose that the selective responsiveness of animals to their ecological niche gives rise to their ability to become biologically blind. Blindness is a fundamental evolutionary adaptation that has also been widely exploited by other creatures (e.g., birds and insects) to camouflage themselves and to avoid detection. Blindness has been called a "flight or fight" adaptation because of its role in predator avoidance and/or evasion. However, blindness also has an evolutionary purpose in that it may serve as an adaptive mechanism in situations where animals are visually impaired. Moreover, when life-threatening threats are absent, blind animals are also more likely to avoid interactions with humans. This paper discusses what it means to be blind, what is known about blindness in primates.
