Share this article on LinkedIn Email Mark Webber feels Sebastian Vettel could not have received a fair hearing in Germany last weekend after the FIA's repeated use of new performance-related fuel limits. Speaking to Autosport.com, the German added that Vettel's win in the German GP was the first genuine result of his championship fight and had been built up into a three-week drama. When Vettel complained about a car issue following his early exit in the race, the stewards and team could not understand why he was running so low on fuel. This was in fact the effect of a new limit being introduced in the car he was using. Teams will be able to run 100kg of fuel in their cars in 2013, up from 96kg, which will be issued by the FIA in a check of all cars on race start. This will allow a smooth, logical use of fuel for each driver without requiring a team to think ahead about how much fuel to run at any given race. The limit will be enforced - and thus teams will be encouraged to comply - in the race itself, which will take place after the qualifying session. However, in the pre-qualifying session there will be a 10kg buffer above the 100kg maximum, which will be issued in later stages of the session. "We know we are going to race with 100kg," said Webber. "So I'm going to say 100kg. "But you never know, in the race we can do different things. "If Sebastian has a run where he wants to spend more, he's going to have to get some more fuel to help him out. "What they did before is taken away, so I don't see how it was a fair decision."

Teams will be allowed to ask for clarification if they think the 100kg limit is being introduced for any reason other than performance, such as a glitch that has prevented fuel sensors from working. AUTOSPORT SAYS: Is it fair that Vettel was given new fuel limits that cost him a victory? The FIA should not have been too hasty in enforcin
