Free and open-source web-based speech-to-text text converter. It is not a web-based voice-recognition application. icSpeech does not implement the speech-recognition algorithms or the transformation between audio and text formats. So, what is it? icSpeech is an open-source speech-to-text transcription application. icSpeech allows you to specify both the language and the context of a web page that you want to transcribe. You can configure the various options such as the speaker's tone and accent, the desired level of error and the appropriate background sounds. You can then record your own speech and preview it on-line. icSpeech can be used in a classroom or office environment. The current version is based on the open-source Open Ears project. How does it work? icSpeech is based on the open-source Open Ears speech-recognition project. After setting the language, the web browser will call a speech-recognition function. The video contains the transcript as well. The script reads the text on-line, converts it into speech and then plays it back to you. You can see the words to speak as well as the text and audio to match the words with. Features: Speech-to-text engine written in Perl Image Synthesizer to show a graphical representation of the speech Real-time speaker-independent speech recognition Wav-like audio support (wav, au, aiff, flac, mp3) Record and save a clip of your own speech Select your own voice for recording Set the speaker's tone and accent Add background sounds (buzzer, beep, phone ringing) Language: English, French, Spanish, Italian, German, Russian, Japanese Select the language by specifying the language code and the context English: en, voc, red, red-america French: fr, jp, fr-french Spanish: sp, en, en-sp Italian: it, en, nl, sk German: de, de-de, de-german Russian: ru, ru-russian Japanese: ja, ja-japanese If you enable phonetic speech recognition you can provide the language and the text separately Enable speaker-independent speech recognition Enable the model Translate text into a human-readable form How to make a PDF EPUB file?
