Travelling to London for the 2016 Summer Olympics and Paralympics, I heard a lot of talk about the dangers that athletes and spectators faced from terrorists on the streets of London. With attacks occurring in broad daylight and on roads that played host to tens of thousands of spectators, safety was obviously a major concern. And so I was surprised to learn that in the case of these major sporting events, there are huge security guards working to protect a wide range of targets. Nowhere is this more the case than the high-profile athletes and their guests when they arrive at London's Olympic and Paralympic venues. My first impression, as I arrived to meet Mayor Boris Johnson, was that it would be a fairly relaxed, more laid-back approach to Olympic security than I expected. The mayor's detail are led by the police. In fact, I even saw a police car with blue lights. This was an interesting sight. And it left me wondering if there is such a thing as an Olympic parking garage. As the mayor's motorcade pulled out of the Olympic Park and onto the Bayswater Road, he seemed to be relaxed. And when he pulled over and met the media, he repeated how relaxed he felt about the city and the safety of visitors and athletes, and that the Olympics were going well. But when we spoke, he explained that the mood in London was "electric" because there was an "expectation" that "something spectacular" would happen. "But we are thinking about the possible effects of these incidents, these threats, and how to respond and plan to respond," he said. Image copyright PA Image caption Olympic security is led by the Metropolitan Police So how does Olympic security work? Up until this point, I thought the police were in charge of keeping the Olympic venues secure, and the mayor had been charged with the important task of ensuring the Games were a success. But then I was told by the Mayor's Office that he is also responsible for the Olympics' security.

SuperConvert is a toolkit for creating, editing, and converting batch files for Photoshop and Lightroom (and Photoshop Express). It makes it really easy to script actions, filters, adjustments, and collections of other actions/filters/adjustments into batch files for use in any program that supports script files (Photoshop CS, Photoshop Elements, Photoshop Lightroom, Photoshop Express). SuperConvert's scripting and batch file capabilities make it ideal for creating repeatable, custom user interface and design workflows. You can build very fast, simple scripts that can execute almost any Photoshop action or filter, and export them into text files for editing and reuse. These scripts can be saved as text files (with actions/scripts/adjustments within the text file), saved as PSD files (with the actions/scripts/adjustments as layers) or even saved as their own sets of actions/scripts/adjustments. In addition, you can specify exactly what images should be processed by your scripts. For example, you can tell a script to process all JPG images, or all PNG images, or all Photoshop CS3 files, or all Photoshop CS4 files, or all Photoshop CS5 files. You can even use the tag information to process certain layers only. As a programmer, you can use many of the script language features of Adobe Script to create your own programs or extend the capabilities of SuperConvert. You can also modify the default scripts and Actions shipped with SuperConvert. You can also easily add new actions, scripts, and adjustments to the scripts stored in SuperConvert. You can even create a new Photoshop action by writing your own action script in a script language, like Python. Key Features:

- Create and edit script files (.acr) and batch files (.pls)
- Simple programming interface for creating new script functions
- Easily create and edit Photoshop actions and layers by simply adding more script functions
- Use text in your scripts to specify conditions for processing
- Add basic scripting for working with Photoshop actions, filters, and layers
- Include scripting for working with Photoshop Express
- Include scripting for working with a new ActionScript 3.0 language
- Includes over 100 built-in Actions, Filters, and Adjustments
- Script to convert JPG and PNG images to Photoshop files (filter, script)
- Script to save a Photoshop file and JPG images in a single folder
- Can save scripts in a folder and create a script file for each folder
