In certain electrical connectors, such as the ones depicted in FIGS. 1, 2, 3, and 4, the terminals (or terminals) are coupled to the connector base (or housing) by being sandwiched between the housing and a clamp. The clamp secures the terminals to the housing by holding the terminals in place so that the terminals do not become separated from the housing. The clamp typically is secured to the housing by the molding process. In some connectors, however, there may be a need for terminals to be replaced in the field. For example, as can be seen in FIG. 1, some connectors may have a very large number of terminals. In some connectors, a terminal could possibly need to be replaced because it was damaged or lost. Unfortunately, these connectors may also have a number of electrical terminals that are not easily accessible. In particular, in some connectors, a terminal could be installed in the base (or housing) in a manner such that it may be difficult to remove the terminal from the housing. For example, in some connectors, a terminal could be installed in the base (or housing) in a manner such that a side of the terminal may be received in the base (or housing) and a base of the terminal may be received in an aperture of the base (or housing). These types of connectors may be referred to as blind connectors. Although blind connectors work well in certain applications, there is always a need for a connector that can be easily assembled and/or disassembled. In the case of connectors that include clamps, it may be easier to assemble a connector if the terminals are secured to the housing such that they are not separated from the housing.
