The contact angle is shifted to lower values at lower humidity for all cases. This phenomenon is explained by the presence of a layer of θ (non-polar) monomers around the droplets, which accounts for a decrease in the contact angle when the humidity increases. Additionally, it is shown in Fig. 4{ref-type="fig"} that the presence of polymer has a significant effect on the water desorption behavior. When a solution of the neutral monomer is taken into account the contact angles are much smaller at all temperatures studied. However, in the case of the acidic monomer the values of Θ for the two temperature cases are similar. The presence of the polymer strongly influences the water desorption and can change drastically the wettability of the substrate. For this reason, the surface of the neutral glass substrate is more polar than the one of the acidic glass. On the other hand, although the initial contact angle (Θ_{00}) is larger in the case of the neutral monomer, the contact angle for the case of acidic monomers is significantly larger than the contact angle for the case of neutral monomer in the same temperature case. In the case of the neutral glass substrate, the weakly polarizable part of the glass causes the contact angle to increase, while the strongly polarizable water on the surface of the glass (i.e., the network) causes the contact angle to decrease. The surface of the acidic glass is 6a5afdab4c

In the detection of non-conductive objects, capacitive array sensors are proposed. Two circular arrays are used on a touch panel and the capacitance of the two single pixels is measured by a microcontroller. The difference between the positive and negative capacitances is detected using a clamp circuit. And finally the capacitance difference of all the pixels of the array is measured by an analog switch circuit. These two different circuits are designed by using FPGA.
