Entry The viral envelope and membrane glycoproteins mediate retrovirus entry into host cells, which includes interaction with the cell surface, membrane fusion, viral genome uptake, nuclear import, integration and transcription. The viral envelope glycoproteins can be divided into the structural glycoproteins (gp120, gp41) and the fusion glycoproteins (gp160, gp140), with gp160 and gp140 preferentially expressed by activated T cells. However, many human lymphotropic viruses, such as human T cell lymphotropic viruses type I (HTLV-I) and human immunodeficiency viruses type 1-2 (HIV-1-2) and type 3 (HIV-3), are known to be fusion defective. Instead, infection relies on interaction of the viral envelope glycoproteins with receptor molecules on the target cell surface and subsequent uptake of the virion-cell membrane complex into the cell. Within the cell, the viral genome is released into the cell cytoplasm, where it is transcribed into DNA, which is then transported into the nucleus where the provirus integrates into the cellular genome. This process is essentially the reverse of reverse transcription, the retroviral uncoating process.

Q: Enabling PyDev autocomplete in Eclipse I'm using the PyDev plugin in Eclipse for Python development. I use an external IDE to run the application while being in Eclipse. I created a new external tool and added the External Tools window. I just want to make it easy for me to test my code, for example, in any new file I just press ctrl+space and I get the list of methods available and they even go into my current file if they're currently on my selection. However, it doesn't happen when I write, it only happens when I press the space key. I know that pressing the space key leads to a rather "simple" source code, but any input is appreciated.

A: The PyDev autocomplete mechanism is called "QuickDoc". You can see more details here : It is not "supported" in External Tools (you can add specific code to perform QuickDoc in your External Tool if you
