Maternal administration of glucocorticoids (GCs) to pregnant women increases the risk for a wide range of disorders in offspring. Although the effects of pregnancy on endothelial function have been well described, data regarding the effects of pregnancy and maternal GC use on vascular endothelium in offspring are limited. Endothelial function was examined in 37 infants of mothers who had used GCs during pregnancy and 28 matched controls. There was a trend for an association between prenatal GC exposure and a decline in flow-mediated vasodilation. This was most prominent in the subgroup with a positive family history of hypertension. We did not find a significant association with oxidative stress or genetic polymorphisms related to GC metabolism. Our findings indicate that maternal
