Sensible Note Taker Screenshots: Sensible Note Taker Free Screenshots Sensible Note Taker ScreenshotsEvery six minutes, a person in the United States dies from suicide. While most deaths are young people, the median age at death in suicides is 55. In 2010, the most recent year for which data is available, there were more than 47,000 suicides. This is a staggering number. These deaths represent almost one in every 20 Americans. But one group of people are at even greater risk of suicide than the general population: people with depression. The prevalence of suicide in people with depression has been estimated to be as high as 20%. According to the National Institutes of Health, there is no one cause of depression. No single factor causes it. However, those with this disorder have an increased risk of experiencing the following symptoms: A loss of interest or pleasure in activities that previously gave the individual pleasure Fatigue or loss of energy Feelings of worthlessness or guilt Loss of concentration or difficulty making decisions Feelings of hopelessness Thoughts of death or suicide, Recurrent thoughts of death or suicide Thoughts of killing oneself In this article, we will explore the relationship between suicide and depression and the most common types of depression. We will also touch on the treatments and psychosocial resources that have been developed to address the unique mental health concerns of those with depression and thoughts of suicide. What is Depression? Depression is a complex mental health condition that affects an estimated 7.7% of people in the United States in any given year. This is a lot of people! Depression affects how a person thinks, feels, and behaves. It's characterized by a loss of interest or pleasure, sadness, a sense of guilt or worthlessness, and a loss of energy. Depression is also a highly disabling condition that causes much suffering. Most people who experience depression develop chronic, recurrent depression. When a person experiences the first signs of depression, the symptoms can be mild. However, the person may feel
