The team including Monojit Maji, who recently completed his doctorate at the Centre for Nanoscience and Nanotechnology (CENaM) at Indian Institute of Science (IISc) and is now a project scientist at the U.S.’ Advanced Research Projects Agency–Energy (ARPA-E), and Belgium’s Johan Van Oene and Paul Bonnefon, all affiliated to the Centre’s Optical Nanoscopy Laboratory, demonstrated that they have found an effective method to synthesise sub-micron and nano-sized gallium arsenide (GaAs) nanorods using dimethyl amine (DMA) and their surface modified nanoparticle core gallium (Ga) could be successfully deposited on the surface of the nanorods using Ga-DMA complex. “Nanorods are of great importance for electronics, optics and photonics, and their utility could be maximised only if they could be made in large quantities and with uniform shapes,” said Dr. Maji. “We have found a way to align and deposit GaAs nanorods in large quantities, which are uniformly shaped and optically active. It will enable us to manufacture GaAs nanorods in various colours – for example, red, green or blue, which is currently very difficult. This is not the case with the existing methods which require high temperature, expensive equipment, toxic chemicals and result in deformed nanorods,” he added. The team had developed 1cb139a0ed
